Executive Summary

The paper is about Jujuna - Georgian wine brand, but much more modern and mostly targeted to young audience. Jujuna is a semi-sparkling wine established in 2018 as a tapping wine, which was used to do some extraordinary cocktails and appeared on festivals and other social events. Now Jujuna is bottled with the new packaging and is sold in supermarkets as well as online. Jujuna has already made its first export in Japan.

Despite the quick development, Jujuna could not attract a significant amount of new customers. To obtain this, the contains a number of recommendations for the development of the marketing mix (4Ps) of the product.

The company is recommended to create a variety of products by producing the wine with different flavors (Jujuna is very popular in making some cocktails) and add new colorful packaging. For the lovers of fresh cocktails, the respective ingredients, such as fresh berries may be sold together with Jujuna, which will make it much easier and quicker to use the product. Cocktail recipes should also be included in the packaging.

To attract new customers, the paper recommends focusing on the supermarkets. Making some tasting events would also augment brand awareness. The content of social media pages, which plays a significant role in Jujuna promotion, should be also changed and create a more cosy environment instead of still focusing on entertainment and nightlife.

Product placement in some TV shows is quite expensive, although collaboration with some popular bloggers/vloggers would not be less effective nowadays.

Considering the recommendations given herein and the current environment, Jujuna has the potential to develop its brand.

1. Introduction

There is a very large wine market in the world and especially in Europe, which is constantly growing and contains a mix of massive global producers and small, local wineries (Mordor Intelligence, 2021). For Georgia, it is more a tradition than a business, since Georgia is admitted to be a cradle of wine (Riley, 2018). Therefore, most Georgian traditions and culture is integrated with wine.

This paper is about Jujuna - one of the Georgian wine brands, but sharply different from all of them. Jujuna is a semi-sparkling wine. It was established in 2018 and initially appeared at festivals and other social events. Initially, it was created as a tapping wine, which was used to do some extraordinary cocktails as well. The brand was very popular amongst the people loving attending social events.

After the pandemic, due to the lockdowns and suspension of all kinds of events and festivals, all the selling points of Jujuna have been closed. Although it became a trigger for the brand's impressive development. To save the business, at the beginning of the pandemic, Jujuna started online sales, which were very successful.

Right after, as for the second wave of the pandemic, Jujuna already had a rebranded product with a different philosophy and totally new packaging. Bottled semi-sparkling wine is already sold in Georgian markets. In October 2021, Jujuna entered a Japanese market, which is a very big success for such a new Georgian brand.

All this story made this brand very interesting. Jujuna is quite popular amongst different segments and is growing rapidly. They made a lot in a very short time, but they have much more potential to use different strategies and make the brand more successful. All these will be discussed in this paper.

2. Marketing Mix (4Ps) Evaluation

2.1.Product

“Jujuna” is a Georgian word (adjective), translated as “shining”, “expressing some love and warmth”. There is also another word in the Georgian language – “Chajujunebuli”, which is derived from “jujuna” and means a person who received alcohol and is slightly and pleasantly drunk. “Jujuna” is also a common woman’s name in Georgia. According to Keller and Lehmann, 2006, choosing a brand name, which attracts customers, is one of the most important marketing challenges. The name “Jujuna” is quite a good idea for Georgian wine, especially for the one targeted mostly on the young people, as the word “Jujuna” is associated with something very light and pleasant.

Jujuna is a white semi-sparkling wine with 11% of alcohol. It is an analog of Italian prosecco. The design of the product is unusual - it is packaged in 250 ml small bottles, which look more like a beer than a wine. By creating such a design the company refused the traditional Georgian concept of the wine. Jujuna tried to make the wine lighter and more “available” for those who like drinking a small amount of wine for hours.

Consumers value food products not only the product’s characteristics, but also according to the way in which the products may be transformed (Dal Bianco et al., 2018). Jujuna wine is famous to be used for making different cocktails. Berries are often added to Jujuna wine. This combination is especially popular. This possibility to make different drinks from one product makes Jujuna more interesting. Also the chances that people with different tastes may love the product is higher.

Together with all of the mentioned, Jujuna is tasty and pleasant to drink. It will be liked by those who love traditional wine or champagne and also by those who enjoy drinking beer or different kinds of cocktails.

2.2. Place

The goods can be distributed to the customers by many channels. The right choice of selling place is very important for product development (Dasar and Hundekar, 2020).

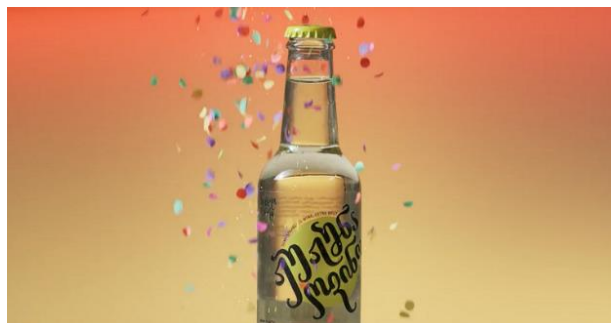

As mentioned in the introduction, in the beginning, Jujuna was only sold at social events. It is natural since it was sold only in a form of a tapping wine.

Brand founders did not think that they needed some other sale points since Jujuna was very popular in its segment, i.e. among people loving going out.

Although, the Covid-19 lock-down led to the instant closure of all the places where Jujuna had been sold. At that time, a lot of brands faced such a challenge and only those, who managed to move online, survived (Koetting, 2020). Jujuna was one of them. It started to sell online. Jujuna wine was tapped in disposable bottles and was sold through popular food delivery companies. Thus, Jujuna managed not to lose its loyal customers.

Jujuna still did not stop and kept developing by creating totally new and innovative packaging for the product.

This new packaging simplified selling and gave the brand the possibility to add one more selling place - supermarkets. Jujuna history is one of the examples of how the place of selling of the product influences its development.

Now Jujuna is also sold in Japan, which will lead to other challenges for the brand since different country means a totally different customer culture which should be deeply analyzed by the brand.

2.3. Price

Price is one of the important elements which should be taken into consideration while planning the brand marketing strategy (Parmer, Dillard and Lin, 2021). According to the researches, it is observed that wine prices significantly vary despite very similar sensory quality attributes (Alonso, 2010).

The average price range for Georgian wine sold in the supermarkets is about 10-25 Georgian Lari per 750 ml bottle. Nowadays Jujuna is sold in 250 ml bottles in supermarkets as well as online and the price of one bottle is 4.5 Georgian Lari. The price of tapping Jujuna wine is almost the same. Thus the price of Jujuna falls in the average price range and is affordable for most of Georgian customers.

According to Heidari, 2017, the research showed a significant relationship between price and enhancing sales. Consequently, it is not surprising that there are frequent discounts on Jujuna wine. When discounted, it usually costs 3.95 Georgian Lari. Probably the main reason for such discounts mostly in supermarkets is to attract new customers, other than those who are familiar with Jujuna from some social events and are already loyal to the brand.

On the other hand, such a low price may lead to the new customers' wrong impression about the wine's quality. Although, there is a question surrounded in the respective literature, whether the wine quality matters. The main reason for such debates is the subjective and imprecise nature of wine quality evaluation by the customers (Oczkowski and Doucouliagos, 2015). Even though, before trying the wine, the price is one of the first and most important indicators of its quality. Mastrobuoni, Peracchi, and Tetenov, 2013 provide evidence to suggest that for some consumers prices do signal quality.

2.4. Promotion

Jujuna has quite a creative promotion campaign. Its website is very unique, easy to manage, full of colors, music, and funny statements. “Jujuna Wine is your faithful chaperone into the joyous land of freedom, delight, and pleasantly squiffy. Oh, and make sure it’s extra cold - for balmy shades and warm sentiments, when iffy.” This is the product description placed on the website (Jujuna, 2021). There are some recipes for making cocktails from Jujuna wine on the website as well as other news and information about the brand, but all this information is submitted in an informal way.

The brand is very active on social media as well. Jujuna has quite popular Facebook, Instagram and Tiktok pages. Their content is mostly funny. For Christmas, they made a very good video, where the Jujuna staff sings some popular Christmas songs with the changed texts and instead of Christmas, they congratulate people Friday as a day when everyone goes out and drinks Jujuna.

Jujuna is often a sponsor and participant of popular events and festivals targeted to mostly young people.

Jujuna has an innovative service called “BAR ON CALL”, which means that customers can invite Jujuna with all its attributes to an event.

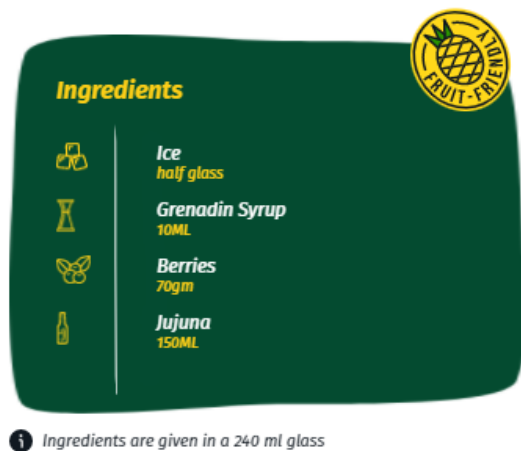

This is how the “Bar on Call” Jujuna looks. It is a wise method for promoting the product and delivering them to the targeted customers. Usually, people loving entertaining, dancing and drinking attend such events. Meeting Jujuna bar may motivate them to buy Jujuna wine in the supermarket and make some cocktails at home, which they tried at an event. It also rises the brand awareness since there is Jujuna logo on the posters and advertisements of most of the similar events, which makes the brand associated with them.

When talking about the promotion, it should be mentioned that Jujuna bottles are also sold packed in the carton box, 2 or 4 bottles in each box. Such packaging makes it easier to carry and also promotes the selling of several bottles instead of one.

3. Marketing Mix (4Ps) Recommendations

3.1. Product

As described above, Jujuna is a unique product by its lightness in taste as well as in appearance, since it is mostly targeted to the young people, especially clubbers. The company started to sell bottled wine in supermarkets but the number of its customers are not increased significantly, since they have no information about the uniqueness of the product.

One of the most important characteristics of the product is that different cocktails can be made out of it. It is manifested on the website, where even the recipes are given as well as on social media of the brand, where the videos are uploaded describing the cocktails making process. Although, the product and packaging do not show or tell anything about such important information. Since the company admits that Jujuna is much tastier when adding different ingredients, it can be interesting in terms of variety but it complicates the usage process for the customer.

The recommendation would be to produce already ready cocktails made from Jujuna, so that only opening and drinking is necessary, which will make the consumption process much easier and comfortable for the customer.

It is possible that adding some fresh fruit or juice to the wine makes the cocktail fresher and tastier. In such a case, the company may sell Jujuna bottles together with the small box of the necessary amount of the respective ingredients, for example berries, syrup, etc. to make the cocktail.

The recipe should also be included in the packaging. In such a way the product may become much more interesting and attractive for the customers. It will look much more unique between the similar wine, beer, and cocktail bottles. The company incomes will also grow since the price of the ingredients may be higher than their market value. According to Broekhuizen and Alsem, 2002 customers often are ready and moreover need to pay more for customized products, since in such a case, their needs will be better met. If a firm starts a co-production process to make a product tailored to the customer's needs and this adds the product more value, price moves to the background (Wind and Rangaswamy, 2001).

Variety of the product is also very important for customers. Nowadays, Jujuna has only one product but with different form (tapping, bar on call, bottled). When entering to the supermarket, customer sees only one kind of Jujuna, but a human needs to have a choice (ElMaraghy et al., 2013). Would be better if there were an ordinary Jujuna (in green packaging as it is), as well as Jujuna with different flavored, packaged each in the corresponding color, for example Jujuna cocktail with berries would be purple, with orange juice – orange, etc.

3.2. Place

For the satisfaction of the consumers, it is important to strategically locate the product so that they are available at the right time in the right place and in the right quantity (Musungwini, S. and Zhou, T.G., 2014).

Despite the history told above and the rebranding, which opened a lot of possibilities to the brand, currently Jujuna wine is still mostly sold on the events. Because of an uncertain environment caused by the pandemic, this is an unpleasant fact for the company since social events are still very decreased and they may be prohibited every day.

Therefore brand should focus on the supermarkets. Currently, you can find Jujuna only one supermarket chain. It should be recovered and Jujuna should be sold even in one more big chain of supermarkets such as Carrefour, for example.

It would be reasonable to focus on online selling as well. Nowadays this is the most stable place to maintain the product selling in any situation. Jujuna should cooperate with more popular delivery companies. Its product is placed on only one of them, although another two (delivery companies) are more popular.

3.3. Price

The recent price is normal and acceptable for most of the customers, but as mentioned above, it may make the customers think of its lower quality. Therefore, a small augmentation of the price together with the addition of the variety of the product would be reasonable.

Here the generally negative implications of higher prices should be balanced with the positive implications of consumer willingness to pay a premium for personalization along with reduced price comparisons (Moon, J., Chadee, D. and Tikoo, S., 2008). Consumers will pay much higher prices for reputable wines from a well-known producer or region because they do not have sufficient information or they are uncertain about quality (Schamel, G., 2006).

At the beginning of the issuance of new products, the price may be lower to attract people to try them. Afterward, it may be raised accordingly. It could be a better strategy in order to avoid negative implications for the brand.

3.4. Promotion

All the Jujuna's promotion campaigns still focus on nightlife, events and festivals. Their social media attract people who love drinking wine and cocktails at home while watching TV as well.

Promotion innovations consist of using new ways to market products in order to encourage consumers to purchase them (Phillips, 2010). Although social media is not a new way, but already a very popular among marketers, Jujuna is advised to change its content on social media and create there more family and cosy atmosphere to attract different and much more big segment of customers.

Tasting events held in the big supermarkets during Christmas or other celebrations days, when a lot of people go shopping, would be great opportunity to increase the brand awareness. Considering that the Jujuna wine taste is good, this will have additional benefits "through word of mouth" (ContÁ² et al., 2015).

Product placement in some TV series targeted to young people, as well as placement in some popular YouTube or Instagram vlogs/blogs, would also help the company to boost its selling.

4. Conclusion

For a 3 year-old company, Jujuna has quite a varied and interesting experience in brand development. Despite the pandemic and closure of all the selling points of the product, which were social events, the company managed to maintain its loyal customers and provide a comfortable delivery service. Although the packaging of the product (tapping wine) did not give the company the possibility to broaden its customer circle and place the product in different places. This problem was also successfully resolved by rebranding the company and by making new packaging. The appearance of bottled Jujuna in supermarkets was a new big step for the company, which was followed by the first export in Japan.

Although the segmentation and targeting of the product did not change, since the company could not manage to attract a new audience.

In order to create the variety of the product, different flavors (which are so popular in the cocktails made from Jujuna) may be added to the wine and produce new colorful packaging. For the lovers of fresh cocktails, the respective ingredients, such as fresh berries may be sold together with Jujuna, which will make it much easier and quicker to use the product. Cocktail recipes should also be included in the packaging.

To attract new customers, it would be recommended to focus on the supermarkets. Making some tasting events would also augment brand awareness. The content of social media pages, which plays a significant role in Jujuna promotion, should be also changed and create a more cosy environment instead of still focusing on entertainment and nightlife.

Product placement in some TV shows is quite expensive, although collaboration with some popular bloggers/vloggers would not be less effective nowadays.

Considering the above recommendations and the current environment, Jujuna has the potential to attract new customers and significantly augment its sales.
